Electricians nationwide typically charge between $40 and $100 per hour of work, so smaller and quicker jobs will always be cheaper. Garage door repair Photo Credit: Tony Buser / Flickr / CC BY-SA 2.0 What happens if, a year from now, a cable in your new garage door system snaps or a spring breaks (and your garage door didn't come with a warranty)? You'll spend more than you would if you installed it yourself, but you'll end up with a much better finished product. Plus, most installers will offer a warranty on their work in case something goes wrong down the line, and you definitely won't get that through the DIY route. Either way, you should expect a garage door with windows to cost more than one without. Prices for standard steel or aluminum garage doors with windows usually start at about $700, and the price goes up from there depending on the number and style of the windows. If you're willing to invest more money in your garage door installation, you can get a more stylish material like wood or glass or a lower-maintenance vinyl door. Some materials — wood, especially — may require lots of maintenance and repairs over the years. Ask local garage door installers for an accurate picture of what your permit fees might be. Specifics like the size and quality of the garage door will determine your project's actual budget. If you need to be extremely cost-efficient, you could choose to have a simple non-insulated aluminum or steel garage door installed on old tracks, sometimes for as low as $375 total. High-end projects for homeowners looking to splurge can cost as much as $4,540. Can you replace a garage door yourself? Garage size is an important indicator of door size, so it's a significant factor in figuring out your project budget for a garage door replacement. A one-car garage door, or single garage door, will usually be about 7 to 10 feet wide and 7 to 8 feet tall. Keep in mind, the average range of prices to replace a garage door will vary. While these cost estimates may not cover every single model available from every single brand, they should still give you a general idea of which brands tend to be more affordable than others. The price range is so wide because garage doors come in many different materials and styles. When it comes to multi-car garages, you have a few different options for garage doors. Your options are similar for a three-car garage. A replacement at this price point might include a double garage door large enough for two cars made out of a more stylish material like wood or even glass. Where will your garage door replacement cost fall on this spectrum? Make sure to keep future costs in mind when choosing the material for your garage door. A glass, fiberglass, or wood garage door may require installation by a specialist. Make sure your contractor has experience working with the garage door material you want before you hire him or her. We'll discuss individual pricing factors to help you decide the best budget for your needs. Clopay brand doors are always built-to-order, so you can completely customize your selection. Expect to spend from $500 to $2,500 to replace a one-car garage door. Find a professional garage door installer near you Think of all the extra work that could surround a garage door replacement. The more layers, the more effective the insulation will be. A garage door might roll up or tilt up onto tracks in the ceiling to save room or swing forward to open for a more rustic look. Here are some of the most common types of garage doors, with details on how they work and how much they cost: Tilt-up garage door One large, solid piece of material instead of panelsNeeds extra room because it swings out when opening Comes in fully retractable styles or versions that form a small canopy over the mouth of the garageYou usually have to open them manuallyTypical cost: $480 - $1,530 Sectional garage door Photo Credit: Cary Peterson / Flickr / CC BY-ND 2.0 Several smaller panels hinged together to slide up into the ceiling easilyMost popular style in the U.S.Don't need extra room for opening and closingUsually has an automatic openerTypical cost: $480 - $1,770 Photo Credit: Andrew Lorente / Flickr / CC BY 2.0 Rolls up into a bundle instead of sliding into tracks in the ceilingComes in sectional and one-piece stylesDurable, rarely needs repairs or maintenanceInstallation can be difficult Typical cost: $630 - $2,370 Photo Credit: Jason Taellious / Flickr / CC BY-SA 2.0 Glass panels hinged together with aluminum or steel framesRolls up in sectionsInsulated or non-insulated glassRarer and more expensive than other roll-up garage doorsTypical cost: $850 - $5,950 Photo Credit: Pixabay Double doors that swing out in the middle to openGives your home an upscale, traditional appearanceCome in many designs and styles, some with arched or rounded topsOften feature windows Typical cost: $980 - $6,130 Garage car door with a walk-through door embedded Often requires a custom garage door designTypical cost: $1,000 - $4,750 Like other French doors, double doors made of glass that open outward in the middleNot good for insulation because of all the glassNot very common for garage doorsTypical cost: $1,670 - $5,170 Even within the same style of garage door, prices for materials and installation vary widely. Issues like broken garage door springs and cables have quick, simple fixes. Some of the most common garage door repairs include: Repair or replace springsRepair or replace cablesRepair or replace tracksRepair or replace rollersRepair or replace sensorRepair or replace automatic garage door openerWindow repair Typical garage door repairs are much more affordable than full replacements. Of course not. That typically doesn't include normal wear and tear or severe weather (for which you would need separate hurricane insurance, flood insurance, etc). If you need a new garage door because someone hit the old one with their car, the driver's auto insurance may pay for the replacement. 4. Whether you need a permit will depend on where you live and the extent of your project. For example, if you're knocking out part of the wall to make the garage door opening bigger or adding a second door, you're more likely to need a building permit. Your contractor should know what permits you need, how much they cost, and how to obtain them. Manufacturers rate a garage door's insulation capabilities using R-values. In some cases, you may have to add windows as a customization option if you want them. That depends on the door size and type, but generally speaking, a pro will usually take 3 to 7 hours to remove the old garage door and install the new one. 2. Can you install a new garage door on old tracks with old hardware? You'll usually pay a contractor about $106 to $325 per repair. For a larger garage door, one made of wood or glass, or a custom design, you can assume you'll spend significantly more than the average cost. You may be able to save a little money by removing the old garage door yourself if you're handy, but we recommend leaving the installation of the new door to the pros. Removal is such an integral part of the process that most contractor quotes automatically include removal in the overall garage door replacement price. If the new door is exactly the same size and style as the old one, you can install it on the old tracks. A door installed by a pro will be much more reliable, and your family's peace of mind is worth the cost of labor. 3. Consider the intersection of all these factors for an accurate replacement garage door price estimate. GARAGE DOOR STYLEAVERAGE COST TO INSTALL*includes materials and laborTilt-up garage door$480 - $1,530Sectional garage door$480 - $1,770Roll-up garage door$630 - $2,370Glass roll-up garage door$850 - $5,950Carriage house garage door$980 - $6,130Walk-through garage door$1,000 - $4,750French garage door$1,670 - $5,170 Garage door material Most garage doors are made of low-cost aluminum or steel, but you have other options in material. R-values range from 0 (no insulation) to 20 (thick insulation, usually only necessary in very cold climates). As a general rule of thumb, assume that the higher a garage door's R-value, the more you'll pay for it. Garages intended to hold one car will have only one opening of this size. A garage door replacement shouldn't be a DIY project. One type of garage door might match your home better or suit your needs because of space considerations. Garage door styles also vary in how they open. Adding a single socket or repairing a minor wiring issue would cost a lot less than installing wiring for the entire garage. Most insulated garage doors cost between $500 and $3,000. Keep in mind that some of the more expensive garage door materials — namely glass and wood — would be difficult to insulate. Windows Photo Credit: Cary Peterson / Flickr / CC BY 2.0 Many stock garage doors of different materials already have small glass or fiberglass windows. You may need an existing door removed (which most replacement quotes will include), you might have to install electrical wiring for the garage opener, and the door will likely need repair at some point. We'll go over these additional services and their associated costs to help you avoid surprises when you're going over your garage door replacement bill later. Garage door removal Photo Credit: Forest Service Northern Region / Flickr / CC BY 2.0 The first step in a garage door replacement is removing the old door. These varying aspects of garage doors result in a wide range of budgets for different projects. Below, we'll cover several significant cost factors to give you a good idea of what you should expect to spend on your garage door replacement. Type of garage door Just like with other exterior home features, you'll get the best results in terms of boosting your home's curb appeal if your new garage door blends well with the rest of your house. You can choose your garage door style based on aesthetics and function. The size of your garage determines how many garage doors you need and how big they should be. In her spare time, she enjoys chasing her two cats around the house and trying to keep her houseplants alive. The national average cost is about $1,120, including materials and labor. National average cost: $1,120Typical price range: $590 - $1,650Extreme low end: $375Extreme high end: $4,540 Most homeowners will pay a professional garage door installer about $590 to $1,650 to remove the old door, including the old hardware and tracks, and install everything new. If for any reason your old garage door is already gone and you don't need your contractor to remove it, you can subtract this cost from your overall project budget. Electrical work Most garages are already equipped with electricity and have at least a few sockets, including one in the ceiling for hooking up the garage door opener. But there are always oddballs for any number of reasons. Many insurance policies will cover a garage door replacement in the event of fire, theft, vandalism, plumbing leaks, and other events usually covered by home insurance. If you don't have your heart set on a whole new garage door, you likely will save money by repairing a few essentials and keeping your existing door. Garage Door Replacement Cost by Location One reason it's hard to pinpoint an exact garage door installation cost without talking to a local contractor directly is that material and labor costs can vary widely depending on where you live. Contractors (and in turn, homeowners) in states with high taxes might pay hundreds of dollars more than someone in another state for the exact same garage door. A single-car garage door with windows can cost as much as 70% more than one without, while windows typically add 30% to 50% to the cost of a two-car garage door. Garage door opener Unless you want to open and close your garage door manually every time you leave the house or come home, you'll need to install a new garage door opener. A garage door replacement price quote may not automatically include the cost of installing a new opener. Most of the time, replacing a garage door opener will cost between $186 and $648 for the opener itself and the labor to install it. Permits Because a garage door replacement is such a minor home improvement project, you may not need to obtain a permit. Does homeowners insurance cover garage door replacements? Replacing a garage door is an easy way to boost your home's curb appeal, and research shows this home improvement project has a high return on investment. Whether your garage door has aged and broken down or you just want to update your home's aesthetic, expect to spend between $590 and $1,650 on a professional garage door replacement. There are no new material's involved that you would have to purchase. Do you have to replace the whole thing again? If your garage doesn't have electricity or doesn't have a socket in the right spot, you'll have to hire an electrician to install new wiring before you can install an automatic garage door opener or other electrical features. The cost of electrical work completely depends on the scope of what needs doing. For instance, Amarr brand doors are affordable and eco-friendly because they're made from recycled materials. For starters, garage doors are large and heavy, so you would likely have a hard time hauling the old door to the dump and transporting the new door. Even if you manage to figure out transportation, you could easily mess up the installation or, worse, hurt yourself, because garage doors have so many complex parts. There are countless differences between one garage door and the next, from the style of the door to the material to the degree of insulation. How long does it take to replace a garage door? The cost of living in a particular city will impact labor rates, too. For example, in a huge city like New York or Los Angeles, a garage installer's hourly rate will be much higher than it would be in a small town in middle America. Take the national averages presented in this guide into consideration, but take them with a grain of salt. Things like material and the degree of customization will affect that price. Insulated garage doors If you want to spend time working or playing in your garage without freezing or melting during the most extreme parts of the year, you'll want to choose a garage door with some level of insulation. Insulated garage doors contain one or more layers of polystyrene or polyurethane. Usually, removing the old door means removing the old tracks and hardware, too. Garage door removal on its own costs about $35 to $130. Nationally, building permits for this kind of project usually fall between $40 and $190. Talk to your garage door installer to find out if he or she has relationships with any brands that could result in savings for you. That way, opening your garage door will be as simple as pressing a button. If you need the opener replaced along with the garage door itself, make sure you communicate that to your installer. Expect to spend $1,800 to $9,300 on a custom garage door installation. Garage Door Replacement Cost by Garage Size Will your garage need to store one, two, three, or even more cars? However, the cost of a professional garage door replacement usually includes installing new tracks and hardware. Find a professional garage installer near you Conclusion If you hire a local contractor to replace your garage door, expect to spend between $590 and $1,650 for materials and labor. This price range typically covers standard doors made of mid-range materials. Garage doors from Overhead Door come with 24/7 maintenance and repair services. Each brand has its own perks and pitfalls. You can think beyond the stock model and design your own custom or semi-custom garage door — for a price. You may need to go the custom route if your garage door is a non-standard size or if you want a particular color or design. Remember that you won't know for sure how much your garage door replacement — or any other home improvement project — will cost until you get quotes from local contractors. Note: We recommend getting at least three quotes to compare prices before settling on which contractor to hire. FAQ About Garage Doors 1. The cost is so low because homeowners only have to pay for labor. Each garage door type comes in different materials and sizes, with higher or lower quality models from different brands. If you have two cars, you might have two separate single garage doors or one larger door that's typically 16 feet wide at least and 24 feet wide at most. Replacing two single-car doors will cost about $1,100 to $4,700, while the cost of replacing one double two-car garage door would be more like $750 to $4,000. Custom and semi-custom doors will almost always cost more than cookie-cutter stock options. Garage door openers usually connect to a remote that you can keep in your car and/or install inside the garage. Your installer also can help you decide which brand would best meet your specific needs. Some of the most popular makers of garage doors include: AmarrHormannClopayCHI Overhead DoorsRaynorWayne DaltonThe Overhead Door We estimated approximately how much a new garage door costs from each of these brands using pricing data from around the web. If your garage has three separate single doors, replacing them all would cost about $1,600 to $7,000.
